

LAW AT CENTURY'S END - A MILLENNIAL VIEW FROM THE HIGH COURT OF AUSTRALIA

THE HON JUSTICE MICHAEL KIRBY AC CMG*

IN THE BEGINNING

When I sit in the No 1 courtroom in Canberra, it is impossible to escape the presence of the three original Justices of the High Court - Chief Justice Griffith, Justice Barton and Justice O'Connor. Their huge portraits are the only ones which hang in that room. Their presence is palpable. They remind the present Justices, and all who come into the room, of the continuity of the law and of the Court.

The portrait of Griffith, copied by Sir William Dargie from the original which hangs in the Supreme Court of Queensland (where he had also been Chief Justice), makes him appear somewhat lifeless, formal, remote. Barton with his cigar looks what he was - an urbane, comfortable, efficient lawyer who helped hammer the Australian federation together and became its first Prime Minister. O'Connor has a sensitive Irish face which belies the austere robes and tricorne in which he presents himself.

In moments of reverie, I ask myself what they would say to us if they could come back and witness the product of their handiwork a century later? What would they feel about the role of the Court which they helped to establish? Would a week in our chairs seem very different from the same interval in October 1903 when they first assumed office? As the world approaches a new millennium, the federation its centenary and the Court the celebrations of its first hundred years, it is natural to look back in this way; and to look forward.

To attempt an answer to my questions, I opened the first volume of the authorised decisions of the Court, the Commonwealth Law Reports. It provides an interesting insight not only into the work of the Court in 1903-1904 but also into Australian society at that time and its legal and social problems.

---

* Justice of the High Court of Australia. The text of the article is based on an Address for Monash University Law School Foundation, Melbourne, 22 November 1999.

The first reported decision, Dalgarno v Hannah<sup>1</sup> 1 records a motion to rescind an order granting special leave to appeal which had been made before the passage of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth). The record of the facts tells of a jury verdict for £200 damages in an action brought by a telephone worker against a nominal defendant in the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The report comments that the decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales refusing to intervene in the verdict was obscure: it not clearly appearing whether the judgment of the Court was based upon the maxim res ipsa loquitur, or whether there had been additional evidence of negligence.<sup>2</sup> A comment on the second page caught my eye. The Court had just heard an appeal which raised a question whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur should be banished from our law precisely because of the uncertainties to which it was said to give rise.<sup>3</sup> Some problems just keep coming back to revisit us.

Dalgarno and several other cases in the first volume explore the grounds upon which special leave to appeal would be granted by a court where the applicant cannot come as of right. In 1903 appeals as of right lay where the judgment under consideration concerned a matter in issue amounting to the value of £300 or where it affected the status of a person.<sup>4</sup>

The first volume contains a report of a Privy Council decision in an Australian appeal refusing special leave to appeal from early orders of the High Court of Australia. In Daily Telegraph Newspaper Co Ltd v McLaughlin<sup>5</sup> the record shows that their Lordships declined to intervene on the basis that the case was ‘unattended with sufficient doubt’ to justify that course.<sup>6</sup> I always wondered where that phrase came from. When, in the Court of Appeal, I would sometimes see my decisions upheld by the High Court, by the use of that formula, I sometimes felt a little hurt. Did it mean that there was ‘doubt’ about the correctness of my reasons; but not enough of it to warrant the grant of leave? Was it perhaps a polite way to say to an applicant, who had spent a great deal of money to seek special leave, that there was actually an awful lot of doubt but that the High Court was too busy to resolve it? It was a formula adopted by the Privy Council and quickly accepted by the High Court itself.<sup>7</sup> It must be possible to formulate reasons for the refusal of special leave which are less Delphic.

In refusing leave in the Daily Telegraph Case, the Privy Council emphasised the importance of the new Australian court:<sup>8</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> (1903) 1 CLR 1.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid 2.

<sup>3</sup> Schellenberg v Tunnel Holdings Pty Ltd (2000) 170 ALR 594. Cf Fontaine v Loewen Estate (1998) 156 DLR (4th) 577, 585.

<sup>4</sup> Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) s 35(1)(a).

<sup>5</sup> (1904) 1 CLR 479.

<sup>6</sup> Ibid 481 citing La cité de Montréal v Les Ecclesiastiques du Seminaire de St Sulpice de Montréal (1889) 14 App Cas 660, 662.

<sup>7</sup> Backhouse v Moderana (1904) 1 CLR 675.

<sup>8</sup> Daily Telegraph Newspaper Co Ltd v McLaughlin (1904) 1 CLR 479, 480.

The High Court occupies a position of great dignity and supreme authority in the Commonwealth. No appeal lies from it as of right to any tribunal in the empire. That can be no appeal at all unless His Majesty, by virtue of his Royal prerogative, thinks fit to grant special leave to appeal to himself in Council. In certain cases touching the Constitution of the Commonwealth the Royal prerogative has been waived. In all other cases it seems to their Lordships that applications for special leave to appeal from the High Court ought to be treated in the same manner as applications for special leave to appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada, an equally august and independent tribunal.

The first volume of the reports also include, as might be expected, early cases concerning the new federal Constitution. Two cases involved attempts by the States to impose burdens on federal employees: D'Emden v Pedder<sup>9</sup> and Deakin v Webb<sup>10</sup> Also in the first volume was the first case concerning the meaning of that elliptical phrase 'duty of excise' appearing in s 90 of the Constitution.<sup>11</sup> That expression has since filled many a page of the reports. One cannot be sure that the majority opinion in Ha v New South Wales<sup>12</sup> means that it will never return.

From the start, cases involving federal legislation were important for the work of the High Court. There were many cases concerned with electoral returns, including no fewer than three in the Chanter v Blackwood<sup>13</sup> litigation which concerned the 1903 federal election for the House of Representatives seat of Riverina. At the beginning of the century, there was much controversy concerning the meaning of ticks and crosses on ballot papers. At the end of the century (in a vote on a referendum probably unimaginable in 1903) republicans and monarchists were fighting over ticks and crosses and their meaning in the ballot of 6 November 1999 concerning the proposal to change the Commonwealth to a republic.<sup>14</sup>

There were several cases on the customs power in 1904, that being at the time the major source of revenue for the new Commonwealth. The conciliation and arbitration power was already beginning to gather the attention that has preoccupied the Court to the present time. Other statutes were also part of the staple diet of the Court from the beginning. There were two cases on State laws affecting lunatics; one case involving a State law for the compulsory acquisition of land; and another concerning that regular visitor to the Court over a century: the indefeasibility of Torrens title.

The type of society which Australia was at the beginning of the century is illustrated by the cases concerning licences for the removal of nightsoil; obligations as to rural vermin-proof fencing; the requirements of pasture protection; the

---

<sup>9</sup> (1903) 1 CLR 91.

<sup>10</sup> (1904) 1 CLR 585.

<sup>11</sup> Peterswald v Bailey (1904) 1 CLR 91.

<sup>12</sup> (1997) 189 CLR 465.

<sup>13</sup> (1903-4) 1 CLR 39, 121, 456.

<sup>14</sup> Benwell v Gray, Electoral Commissioner [1999] FCA 1532.

incidence of gaming and wagering; and whether, in cattle slaughter laws, a ‘pig’ was within the definition of ‘cattle’. The answer given was that it was not.<sup>15</sup>

Business law made its appearance in those days, as it has done ever since. There were cases about bills of sale in insolvency, the duties of bankers to customers<sup>16</sup> and the obligations of company directors to register share transfers.<sup>17</sup> Add to this collection cases on the right to ancient lights, on the powers enjoyed by State police constables and on the construction of wills and you see the great variety of the work of the High Court from its earliest beginnings. Unlike the Supreme Court of the United States, the character of the High Court of Australia was stamped on it by its obligation, from the first, not only to be the supreme constitutional court for Australia but also a general court of appeal supervising all other courts of the new Commonwealth.

FAST FORWARD

If the foundation Justices of the High Court of Australia were to pick up the latest volume of the Commonwealth Law Reports, they would see some changes. True, they would see the same diversity of law and a number of similar problems. The construction of wills has, alas, all but disappeared. There are fewer cases on pasture protection<sup>18</sup> and none on nightsoil. But negligence, which was there at the very beginning, is still a hardy perennial. Indeed, following Donoghue v Stevenson<sup>19</sup> the number and variety of cases on that theme has exploded. In one of the latest volumes there are two decisions, each dealing with the liability of a public authority to a person said to have been harmed by that authority’s failure to act to protect the plaintiff. In one the plaintiff succeeded;<sup>20</sup> in another she failed.<sup>21</sup>

One now common visitor, not found at all in the first volume, is the criminal law. Because of the aphorism that crime does not pay, that body of law has never been as fashionable in the senior ranks of the legal profession as it deserves. Citizens probably consider that the most important areas of the law are crime, family law and (possibly) industrial relations law. Citizens are rarely wrong. At least since the time of Chief Justice Barwick, the High Court of Australia has accepted a sizeable number of cases involving points of criminal law. In recent volumes there is an exploration of the crime of conspiracy to defraud<sup>22</sup> and of the consequences for criminal trials of the conduct of undercover police operations.<sup>23</sup> The controversies about police constables at the beginning of the century were more straight-forward.

<sup>15</sup> Mackay v Davies (1904) 1 CLR 483.

<sup>16</sup> Marshall v Colonial Bank of Australasia (1904) 1 CLR 632.

<sup>17</sup> New Lambton Land and Coal Co v London Bank of Australia (1904) 1 CLR 524.

<sup>18</sup> But cf Puntoriero v Water Administration Ministerial Corporation (1999) 165 ALR 337.
<sup>19</sup> [1932] AC 580.

<sup>20</sup> Pyrenees Shire Council v Day (1998) 192 CLR 330.

<sup>21</sup> Romeo v Conservation Commission (NT) (1998) 192 CLR 431.

<sup>22</sup> Peters v The Queen (1998) 192 CLR 493.

<sup>23</sup> Swaffield v The Queen (1998) 192 CLR 159.

Constitutional law and the law relating to conciliation and arbitration of interstate industrial disputes has remained on the agenda throughout the century. The old faithful, logs of claim, are there in the latest reports,<sup>24</sup> illustrating vividly the adaptability of the Constitution to the changing economic and industrial needs of a continental country with a common economic market. Business law now probably occupies a greater proportion of the Court's time. Cases on bankruptcy,<sup>25</sup> insurance<sup>26</sup> and insurance brokers<sup>27</sup> cover many pages in the contemporary reports. Federal and State law continues to require attention. Customs and excise legislation engaged the present Court as did the State law on stamp duty and the perennial favourite, indefeasibility of registered title.<sup>28</sup> The impact of new technology can be seen in cases now coming before the Court. Two in the recent volume include the use of the technology of listening devices,<sup>29</sup> a facility that the police constables of the turn of the last century could only dream of.

If one considers the differences and the similarities, the latter clearly predominate. Griffith, Barton and O'Connor would not, I think, take long to master the detail of contemporary Australian law. The techniques are substantially unchanged. Save for occasional visitors from Western Australia and Tasmania, the dress of counsel would appear entirely familiar to them, with the wigs firmly in place. Whereas a medical practitioner of 1903, walking into a modern hospital, would feel lost in the world of computer technology and modern pharmaceuticals, the judge or lawyer of the days when the High Court of Australia was founded would not feel lost at all. In law there is merit in stability and continuity. But have we over-valued these features of our discipline? Ought we to have been more questioning about fundamentals? Is it necessarily a matter of self-congratulation that the fundamentals have not changed much since 1903?

THE CHANGES

Court system

This is not to say that change has been a stranger to the High Court of Australia. On the contrary, many changes have occurred in the century which is about to close.

The abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is one of the most significant of the changes.<sup>30</sup> I refer not only to the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council from the High Court and other federal courts, but also the termination of appeals from State Supreme Courts<sup>31</sup> and the clear indication that the

<sup>24</sup> Attorney-General (Qld) v Riordan (1998) 192 CLR 1.

<sup>25</sup> Cannane v J Cannane Pty Ltd (In Liq) (1998) 192 CLR 557.

<sup>26</sup> Johnson v American Home Assurance Co (1998) 192 CLR 266.

<sup>27</sup> Unity Insurance Brokers Pty Ltd v Rocco Pezzano Pty Ltd (1998) 192 CLR 603.

<sup>28</sup> Bank of South Australia Ltd v Ferguson (1998) 192 CLR 248.

<sup>29</sup> For example, Ousley v The Queen (1998) 192 CLR 69.

<sup>30</sup> Privy Council (Limitation of Appeals) Act 1968 (Cth); Privy Council (Appeals from the High Court) Act 1975 (Cth).

<sup>31</sup> Australia Act 1986 (Cth), s 11.

High Court would never again grant a certificate to appeal under s 74 of the Constitution.<sup>32</sup> The insistence that most of the important constitutional cases should be finally determined by the High Court of Australia was a means of avoiding unwanted imperial interference in, or decisions about, federal issues with which English judges were generally unfamiliar.<sup>33</sup>

The removal of the possibility of appeals from the High Court itself to the Privy Council changed the self-image of the Court. No longer was it a penultimate final court of appeal. It was freed from the superintendence of foreign judges, in a way that New Zealand courts, even to this day, have not been freed. The possibility until 1986 that appeals could still be taken to the Privy Council directly from the State Supreme Courts meant that most Australian State courts had to reach many of their decisions with the possibility in mind that a tribunal external to Australia, and other than the High Court, might have a say in a matter of legal principle affecting Australia's law. As it happens, I participated in the Court of Appeal of New South Wales in the last decision of an Australian court which went on appeal to the Privy Council in London.<sup>34</sup> Now that era has passed. It was not wholly unsuitable to Australian conditions in earlier times. It had the merit of linking our law to one of the great centres of law in the world.<sup>35</sup> But the removal of that link has had a considerable influence upon the development of Australia's law in the past two decades. It has affected the sources used by Australian courts and the notions which now prevail about the ultimate foundation of Australian law.<sup>36</sup>

Other features of the courts in the past two decades which have affected the development of Australian law have included the growth of the federal courts following the establishment of the Family Court of Australia and the Federal Court of Australia. Another is the creation of a number of separate State and Territory Courts of Appeal<sup>37</sup> which have altered significantly the sources from which the High Court receives most of its business.

Judicial numbers

Another change in the century past concerns the number of Justices of the High Court. In 1903 the Court comprised the minimum constitutional number, namely a

---

<sup>32</sup> Kirmani v Captain Cook Cruises Pty Ltd [No 2] (1985) 159 CLR 461, 464-465.

<sup>33</sup> O'Sullivan v Norlunga Meat Ltd [No 2] (1956) 94 CLR 367, 375. See generally W M C Gummow, Change and Continuity - Statute, Equity and Federalism (1999) 71ff.

<sup>34</sup> Austin v Keele (1987) 61 ALJR 605; 10 NSWLR 283 (PC).

<sup>35</sup> F C Hutley, 'The Legal Traditions of Australia as Contrasted with Those of the United States' (1991) 55 ALJ 63, 64.

<sup>36</sup> On cases concerning the sovereignty of the Australian people see Kirmani v Captain Cook Cruises Pty Ltd [No 1] (1985) 159 CLR 351, 441-442; Breavington v Godleman (1988) 169 CLR 41, 123; McGinty v Western Australia (1996) 186 CLR 140, 237; Leeth v The Commonwealth (1992) 174 CLR 455, 484, 486.

<sup>37</sup> In New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, Northern Territory. A proposal is under consideration in Western Australia. See M D Kirby, 'Permanent Appellate Courts' (1987) 61 ALJ 391; (1988) 18 Qld Law Soc J 5; (1988) 4 Aust Bar Rev 51.

Chief Justice and two Justices.<sup>38</sup> In 1906, with the appointments of Justice Isaacs and Justice Higgins, the number rose to five. In 1913, with the appointment of Justice Gavan Duffy and Justice Powers, it rose to seven. This is the number that has remained ever since, although for a short interval during the Depression and until Justice Webb was appointed in 1946, one vacancy was left unfilled.

In both the No 1 and No 2 courtrooms in Canberra, the design of the Bench appears to contemplate the eventual appointment of two further Justices. That would bring the complement of the Court to nine - the same as the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Court of Canada. If areas were cleared on level 9 of the Court building in Canberra, where the Justices' chambers are found, it would be perfectly feasible to establish chambers for two additional Justices. There is no constitutional barrier to the enlargement of the Court.

Occasionally the idea has been talked of. The smaller the number the greater the possibility of collegial dialogue. Any increase in the size of the Court would probably have to be accompanied by changes in the Court's methodology and perhaps in the organisation of the way in which it hears and disposes of appeals as the Constitution contemplates.

Court business

In 1903, most of the work of the High Court of Australia comprised appeals coming to the Court as of right pursuant to the provisions of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) s 35. Appeals then lay as of right from any judgment of a Supreme Court of a State exercising federal jurisdiction in a matter pending in the High Court or, as earlier stated, in cases having at stake a sum declared sufficient for such appeal. Otherwise special leave to appeal was required.

The provision for appeals as of right was abolished in 1976. Section 35 of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) was amended to establish a universal rule confining the right to appeal to one where the High Court itself has granted special leave for that purpose. This has also significantly altered the work of the Court which is now, substantially, in the hands of the Justices themselves. They can select and fix the priorities which, in the past, were largely out of their control and substantially determined by litigants. This explains the falling away of cases involving the construction of wills or of most State statutory provisions. In the past, it was enough that the amount at issue reached the threshold necessary for a right to appeal.

Now, different considerations engage the attention of a special leave Bench. Unless those considerations are present, the High Court will not usually intervene. The same is true of the original jurisdiction of the Court. Few trials in the ordinary sense are now conducted by the High Court. Much of the work of taxation, intellectual property and the like, which formerly occupied single Justices, has been assigned by statute to other courts. Alternatively, cases which must come directly to the Court in its original jurisdiction under s 75 of the Constitution may now be removed or remitted to other courts.<sup>39</sup> This is commonly done, particularly if there are disputed facts. This means that any case which remains in the High Court is likely to be an important one. It will typically be one involving difficulty, a significant legal principle, diversity of opinion in the courts below or an apparently serious injustice which calls for the intervention of the highest court.

---

<sup>38</sup> Australian Constitution, s 71

Although the right of the Parliament to confine the appellate jurisdiction of the Court to cases where special leave was granted proved controversial and was even challenged,<sup>40</sup> it is difficult to conceive how the Court, at least in its present numbers and with its present organisation, could have coped if a large proportion of its business arose as of right. Those who knew the Court in the years up to the middle of the 20th century describe its operation in ways that seem familiar to the experience I had in a State Court of Appeal. When there is a large amount of work which cannot be diverted or divested, there are imperatives of throughput and brevity, efficiency and sharing, which are reduced somewhat when the court's docket is controlled by the judges themselves.

Sittings and circuits

Some features of the sittings of the High Court of Australia have remained the same. In June, as in Chief Justice Griffith's days, we return to his beloved Brisbane. In August, the Court travels to Adelaide for a week. In October, it is Perth. Chief Justice Barwick, a keen yachtsman, always attempted to visit Hobart for the Regatta Week in March. Now, the Court only travels to Hobart if business permits; and this is comparatively rare. It does not yet travel to Darwin, although business there has been comparatively brisk. On the establishment of the seat of the Court in Canberra, Chief Justice Barwick attempted to terminate the circuits to the outlying cities. This was resisted by the then Justices. Although views differ, most consider (as I do) that it is important for the Court to maintain the circuits. They provide an essential link between the serving Justices and the legal profession and litigants in the outlying States.

The creation of the Court's permanent building in Canberra undoubtedly had an effect which went beyond the more efficient operations that it permits. Placing the Court in the constitutional triangle in Canberra imprints on the mind of all who work in it the significance which the Constitution assigns to the High Court in both its national and general appellate functions.<sup>41</sup> It may be no accident that the period following the establishment of the seat of the Court in Canberra witnessed significant developments in the creativity of new legal doctrine affecting both the

---

<sup>39</sup> Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth) ss 40, 42. Cf Gummow, Continuity and Change, above n 33, 76-77.

<sup>40</sup> Carson v John Fairfax and Sons Ltd (Receivers and Managers Appointed) (1991) 173 CLR 194.

<sup>41</sup> M D Kirby, 'A F Mason - From Trigwell to Teoh' (1997) 20 Melbourne Uni L Rev 1087, 1092.

Constitution and the general law. Following the example of the Supreme Court of Canada, the High Court of Australia has established videolinks for the conduct of special leave hearings from courtrooms in Brisbane, Hobart, Adelaide, Perth and Darwin. These were not imagined in 1903. They are very efficient. Analysis of outcomes indicates that there is no difference between rates of success for counsel appearing in person, where the judges are sitting in Canberra, and counsel making their submissions at long distance by videolink. The only differences are that average hearings seem to be shorter when conducted by videolink, costs are much lower and litigants can readily attend in outlying centres and see their cases argued. Physical propinquity seems to encourage a greater measure of long-windedness in advocates. This may be a reason for expanding the videolink hearings.

The use of electronic systems has also been helpful in the provision of the decisions of the High Court to the profession and to the general public. The reasons of the Justices are posted on the Internet on the morning they are delivered. Records indicate that there are approximately 660 hits a week indicating visits to the Home Page. These numbers are increasing all the time. They extend to overseas users as well as those throughout Australia. The transcript of oral argument in the Court is on sale usually within two hours of the completion of the hearing. It is also available on the Internet within 24 hours, free of charge. It seems likely that the next step will be video transmission of the hearings before the Court, although upon the wisdom of this innovation opinions differ.

Dress and gender

One matter in respect of which the original Justices would certainly note a change concerns the Court dress of the Justices. In 1986, they decided to abandon the traditional robe and wigs. A simple Australian woollen garment is now worn with no head coverage. In Canada, and in most parts of the former British Empire where wigs have been dispensed with, the robes of judges and advocates have otherwise followed the English tradition which at least has the merit of contrasting black and white elements. Now the High Court is decked in black alone. Some observers find this forbidding - a characteristic which may well have attracted its designers. The change has certainly accelerated moves for the abandonment of wigs both in federal and State courts.<sup>42</sup>

One noticeable change since 1903 is the presence in the Court of Justice Mary Gaudron, the first woman Justice. She was appointed in February 1987. She remains the sole woman to have held the office. One in a century can scarcely be described as a flood. The recent appointments of Dame Sian Elias as Chief Justice of New Zealand and Madame Justice Beverly McLachlin as Chief Justice of Canada indicate the change in the composition of the Bench that is coming throughout the common law world. But its advent in Australia will be slow. Perhaps the original Justices would be scandalised by the public revelation of my own sexuality. Griffith, after all, included homosexual offences in the Criminal Code which he drew up for Queensland.<sup>43</sup> I am sure that I am not the first Australian judge to have been homosexual; nor will I be the last. But I am certainly the first to have been open about it; itself perhaps a sign of changing times. Knighthoods (and the equivalent Damehoods) which were once the automatic entitlement of a Justice have disappeared forever. Chief Justice Gleeson is the first Chief Justice of Australia without the honour of a knighthood, although he is a Companion of the Order of Australia, now the nation's highest civil honour. Even appointment to that rank, which was formerly automatically offered to a Justice, is, it seems, now no longer prompt or assured.

---

<sup>42</sup> Wigs are no longer worn by judges or counsel in proceedings in the Federal Court of Australia, or in the Supreme Court of Tasmania or the Supreme Court of Western Australia in civil matters.

Time limits

For most of the century the High Court has managed without the imposition of formal time limits on the duration of the arguments of advocates. The extended argumentation of the Banking Case<sup>44</sup> before the High Court and the Privy Council, was internationally notorious. But it did not propel the Court into any limitations of the kind long accepted in the United States Supreme Court. With the introduction of universal special leave requirements, time limitations were, at last, imposed. Now, counsel must compress their submissions to 20 minutes. The limitation certainly concentrates the mind of all involved in such hearings, including the participating Justices.

No strict limitations of this kind have been imposed in the presentation of argument in an appeal, once special leave is granted. To a large extent the Court has left it to the parties and their representatives to agree on the time required and on the division of that time. Whether it would be preferable to impose standard time limits for oral argument and to list more cases for hearing, is a matter for the future.

Dissent

One of the most distinctive features of the common law judicial system is the right of appellate judges to express dissenting opinions. Even the Privy Council, which tenders its decisions for the most part in the form of advice to the Queen, has now introduced the right of dissent. In giving his reasons in the Privy Council in Fisher v Minister of Public Safety and Immigration,<sup>45</sup> Lord Steyn observed recently:

A dissenting judgment anchored in the circumstances of today sometimes appeals to the judges of tomorrow. In that way a dissenting judgment sometimes contributes to the continuing development of the law. But the innate capacity of different areas of law to develop varies. Thus the law of conveyancing is singularly impervious to change. But constitutional law governing the unnecessary and avoidable prolongation

---

<sup>43</sup> Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld) ss 208, 209.

<sup>44</sup> Bank of New South Wales v The Commonwealth (1948) 71 CLR 1 (HC); (1949) 79 CLR 497. In the High Court the hearing lasted eight weeks. In the Privy Council, to the astonishment of their Lordships, it also consumed eight weeks.

<sup>45</sup> [1998] AC 673, 686. See also Neumegeen v Neumegeen and Co [1998] 3 NZLR 310, 321 per Thomas J.

of the agony of a man sentenced to die by hanging is at the other extreme. The law governing such cases is in transition.

In the first volume of the Commonwealth Law Reports in Chanter v Blackwood<sup>46</sup> Justice O'Connor regretted his inability to agree with his colleagues. The series was only 65 pages into its record of the doings of the High Court when the first dissent appeared. Justice O'Connor said:

It would have been well if in this decision which will be a guide to the administration of the Act throughout the Commonwealth, the judgment of the Court had been unanimous. I have given the utmost possible consideration to the opinion of my learned brothers, with a view to seeing whether I could not agree with them. Notwithstanding ... I hold a very clear opinion [to the contrary].

The judge went on to express it.

From the start, the High Court of Australia was a court of robust differences. In my dissent in the cross-vesting case of Re Wakim<sup>47</sup> I concluded by borrowing the final remarks of Barton in Duncan v Queensland.<sup>48</sup>

To say that one regrets to differ from one's learned brethren is a formula that often begins a judgment. I end mine by expressing heavy sorrow that their decision is as it is.

With the arrival of Justice Isaacs and Justice Higgins in 1906, the comparative unanimity of the original three Justices of the High Court of Australia was completely shattered. The former, in particular, was a noted dissenter. His command of language, intellectual vigour and consistent vision of the Constitution put him in a special class. One gets the impression that he may not have been the most congenial of colleagues. Yet the power of his intellect has proved resilient. He is often read to his successors.

In the 1970s, Justice Murphy assumed the mantle of the principal dissenter. Of the approximately 600 opinions which he wrote whilst a Justice of the Court, 137 were in dissent. This constitutes 23% of the total. Some of his dissents have proved prescient,<sup>49</sup> although usually the ideas he advocated have been adopted without much acknowledgment. The law is hard on outsiders.

Recently, the Court administration provided statistics on the rate of dissent of the current Justices. According to those statistics, I have overtaken Justice Murphy. Approximately 32% of my opinions are in dissent. The next in proportion is Justice

---

<sup>46</sup> (1904) 1 CLR 65.

<sup>47</sup> Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally (1999) 198 CLR 511.

<sup>48</sup> (1916) 22 CLR 556, 605. See also at 627, per Isaacs J.

<sup>49</sup> For example his dissent in McInnis v The Queen (1979) 143 CLR 575, 586-591 read now with Dietrich v The Queen (1992) 177 CLR 292; Buck v Bavone (1976) 135 CLR 100, 135 read now with Cole v Whitfield (1988) 165 CLR 360.

McHugh with 15%. The rates of dissent of the other Justices are much lower. These figures can, of course, be misleading. In some cases, a Justice may agree in the Court's orders (and thus not be in formal dissent) but express completely different reasons for coming to his or her conclusion. In my own case, this occurred in, for example, Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd.<sup>50</sup> Some commentators have described my opinion there as a dissent; and certainly I did not agree with the views of the majority that the reasons of Justice Dixon in Yerkey v Jones<sup>51</sup> yielded an applicable rule of the Court. But it was not a dissent because I concurred in the Court's order, although for different reasons.

In most countries of the civil law tradition, judicial dissent is completely forbidden. The foundation for this view is a conception of the law as having but one possible exposition. Dissent, it was feared, would undermine the authority of the law which rests upon its certainty. It was upon the insistence of the Allies that the post-War Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany included, in the case of the German Constitutional Court, the right to dissent. Old habits die hard. Dissent is still comparatively rare. It is not uncommon in the European Court of Human Rights. The candid acknowledgment of the choices which judges must make, and of their preferences for differing answers, seems a more honest response to the dilemmas of the law than the pretence that every problem yields but one correct answer.

THE FUTURE

Other courts

Looking into the future, one is bound to make even more mistakes than when looking into the past. The Australian courts hierarchy has changed significantly in the first hundred years of federation. What will be the changes in the century to come?

The attempt to relate the Federal and State court systems in the cross-vesting legislation survived the first challenge.<sup>52</sup> However, following new appointments to the High Court and re-argument, it failed the second scrutiny.<sup>53</sup> It may be quite difficult to repair the problems disclosed by that decision. In my reasons in Gould v Brown,<sup>54</sup> I suggested that it might have been possible for the scheme of cross-vesting to be sustained by a reference of powers to the Federal Parliament pursuant to the Constitution s 51(xxxvii) or the request for, or concurrence of, the Parliaments of the States to the exercise by the Federal Parliament of a power which, at federation, could be exercised by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, as the Constitution s 51(xxxviii) contemplates. This was in error. The fundamental

---

<sup>50</sup> (1998) 194 CLR 395.

<sup>51</sup> (1939) 63 CLR 649, 684..

<sup>52</sup> Gould v Brown (1998) 193 CLR 346.

<sup>53</sup> Re Wakim; Ex parte McNally (1999) 198 CLR 511.

<sup>54</sup> (1998) 193 CLR 346, 483-483.

difficulty which the majority discerned in Re Wakim, in the path of establishing a scheme for cross-vesting of jurisdiction, arises from a conception of the requirements of Chapter III of the Constitution. All powers conferred by s 51, including those mentioned, are expressed to be 'subject to this Constitution'. That means (as would in any case apply, given the structure of the Constitution) subject to the requirements of Ch III. Therefore, within the current constitutional text, it is difficult to see how the status quo ante on cross-vesting could be restored in terms of the Constitution as it stands. No doubt this is why the Federal Attorney-General has announced that consideration is being given to a constitutional amendment.

Recent history is somewhat discouraging for proponents of constitutional referenda. Yet the last constitutional amendments to be approved by the electors occurred on 21 May 1977. They included the approval for the amendment of provisions in Ch III requiring that High Court judges must retire at the age of 70 and other federal judges at that age or at a lower retirement age fixed by the Parliament. That change, effected by the Constitution Alteration (Retirement of Judges) 1977, was carried with a total affirmative vote of 78.63% nationally and with affirmative votes in all six States.<sup>55</sup> Only one other amendment of the Constitution has achieved such an affirmative national vote in favour of change. The amendments made by the Constitutional Alteration (Aboriginals) 1967 to ss 51(xxvi) and 127 of the Constitution reached 89.34% and carried all States.<sup>56</sup>

Whilst the Commonwealth and the States are considering alterations to Ch III of the Constitution, thought might be given to proposals for a national appellate court under the High Court to which appeals from federal, State and Territory courts could lie as of right or under broad conditions. Although this idea might attract some opposition on the basis of States' rights, the need to reconsider national judicial arrangements in the light of developments since 1901 seems indisputable. Should the Constitution remain resistant to formal change in this regard, it could be feasible to explore the alternative possibility of granting personal commissions to judges of Australian courts to participate in the appellate courts of jurisdictions other than their own. Already, Justice Priestley of the New South Wales Court of Appeal, holds a personal commission as a judge of the Court of Appeal of the Northern Territory. His service in that Court is compensated by the provision of a judge of the Supreme Court of the Northern Territory who receives a commission to sit in the Supreme Court of New South Wales. In 2000, Chief Justice Doyle of South Australia and Justice Brooking of the Victorian Court of Appeal were given similar commissions so that they could sit in Darwin with Justice Priestley in a sensitive case. In the smaller States, it has always seemed to me that a separate Court of Appeal could be constituted by appointments of this kind which would involve a practical measure of cooperative federalism. In the industrial relations field, cooperation of this kind has existed for many years. Judges and other members of State industrial courts and tribunals have been given personal commissions as Presidential Members of the Australian Industrial Relations Commission.<sup>57</sup> Sometimes the rigid inflexibilities of the Constitution can be softened by sensible institutional arrangements of this character which are entirely consistent with the cooperative presuppositions inherent in the type of federation which the Constitution establishes.

---

<sup>55</sup> A Blackshield and G Williams, Australian Constitutional Law and Theory (2nd ed 1993) 1188.

<sup>56</sup> Ibid 1186. See Kartinyeri v The Commonwealth (1998) 195 CLR 337, 368, 406-408.

Neighbouring countries

My service as President of the Court of Appeal of Solomon Islands, which I resigned on my appointment to the High Court of Australia, alerted me to the growing influence which the High Court, and other Australian courts, have on the jurisprudence of the courts of neighbouring countries. I refer not only to the Island States of the Pacific and Papua New Guinea but also to countries further away such as Hong Kong and Mauritius. It seems likely to me that the cooperation which already exists in the provision of the decisions of the High Court, and of online access to current and past decisions, will expand by the participation in the courts of neighbouring countries of former Justices of the High Court and judges of other Australian courts. Chief Justice Gibbs has served on the Court of Appeal of Kirabati since 1988. Chief Justice Mason served as a judge of the Supreme Court of Fiji and is a judge of the final Court of Appeal of Hong Kong. He was also my successor as President of the Court of Appeal of Solomon Islands. Justice Dawson also serves on the Hong Kong Court as does former Chief Justice Brennan. The latter was appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court of Fiji, as was Justice Toohey. It seems likely that the Justices of the High Court of Australia will continue to play a role, after retirement, in the courts of neighbouring countries. Obviously, this is a desirable development so long as it is desired by the countries and judges concerned.

With the continued expansion and special treatment of New Zealand in Australian legal arrangements, the possibility of some form of trans-Tasman court cannot be excluded.<sup>58</sup> The constitutional difficulties for Australia are significant. It is a misfortune that, in the days following the Second World War, the British authorities did not have the imagination, or interest, to create a regional Privy Council for the Pacific upon which Australian and New Zealand and other judges could sit together. The experience of participating in the Court of Appeal of Solomon Islands with senior judges from Papua New Guinea, New Zealand and Australia is one which I will always cherish and to which I hope one day I may return.

Methodologies

Several ideas for the methodology of the High Court spring from current techniques. The success of videolinks for special leave hearings makes it likely that this mode of communication (specially adapted to a country of continental size) will expand to appeal hearings. Case management is already a feature of the organisation of all Australian courts, including the High Court. This virtue must proceed with due regard to the obligations of the Court to observe the law and to respect the requirements of individualised justice.<sup>59</sup> It seems likely that judges in Australia will continue to increase their role in the management of litigation. The High Court will not be exempt from this trend. Representative actions present certain difficulties.<sup>60</sup> However, with due safeguards, they can also be a means by which, in a time of mass production of goods and services, litigation can be organised to bring the similar or identical legal claims of many people to justice with lawfulness and efficiency.<sup>61</sup>

---

<sup>57</sup> Workplace Relations Act 1996 (Cth), s 13. The position is reciprocal.

<sup>58</sup> M D Kirby, 'CER, Trans-Tasman Courts and Australasia' [1983] NZLJ 304; M D Kirby and P A Joseph, 'Trans-Tasman Relations - Towards 2000 and Beyond' in P A Joseph (ed) Essays on the Constitution (1995) 129.

It would not be surprising if, in the future, formal time limits were imposed upon oral argument in appellate courts, including the High Court. If this meant an increase in the number of cases which could be heard by those courts, it could prove beneficial. Few now complain about the time limits in argument of special leave applications. The logic of such a requirement, to concentrate the mind and tongue, should take the High Court (and other Australian courts) into a revision of the present conduct of ordinary appeals and other hearings.

The writing of judicial opinions remains the heaviest burden which appellate judges carry. Some changes in the techniques of advocacy have already been introduced. They include the duty to provide extended written submissions. It may be desirable that more radical changes now be contemplated.

Twenty years ago, at a legal convention, I suggested an idea which was denounced at the time as intolerable heresy. It was an idea derived from my experience in the Law Reform Commission in the distribution of discussion papers which helped focus submissions and constructive debate. Why not extend this methodology to the courts? It could be done in one of two ways. Either the court itself could prepare a draft opinion based on the papers. The advocates of the parties could then attack, or support, this document. Alternatively, the parties could be required to draft an opinion for adoption (with adaptations) by the court. This would impose upon them the obligation to relieve judges at least from the often tedious role of recording the facts, the issues, the applicable law and the primary arguments.

The first model is not unlike that observed in some European court systems where a preliminary stage of the appellate process involves the circulation of a draft by the Advocate-General. Would this not assist in focussing debate in an efficient manner and utilising the skills of appellate judges in a way that is more efficient than the often tedious and mechanical burdens which are imposed upon them under current arrangements? Critics might perceive serious and even constitutional problems. Would it mean, if the drafts were prepared by an officer rather than a judge, that

---

<sup>59</sup> Queensland v J L Holdings Pty Ltd (1997) 189 CLR 146.

<sup>60</sup> Bass v Permanent Trustee Co Ltd (1999) 198 CLR 334.

<sup>61</sup> Wong v Silkfield Pty Ltd (1999) 73 ALJR 1427; 165 ALR 373.

part of the judicial power of the Commonwealth had been delegated impermissibly from the courts to the ever-expanding power of the Executive? I am far from convinced that it would not be possible to develop means by which decision-making could be maximised and tedium or routine reduced. I recognise that the solution to many cases lies in the facts. Sifting the detail is often critical to the process of reaching conclusions. The tyranny of the first draft should never lock the open-minded judge into a preconception about the issues in a case or its outcome.

Yet if we compare the methodology of the Australian judiciary and legal profession with that of, say, the medical profession, it is clear that the latter have been much more willing to think with complete freshness, often stimulated by technology. The law is resistant to truly original thinking. This is especially so when it affects the methodology of its operations which has lasted for centuries. There is a professional fear to change long established ways of doing things. Whilst this is psychologically understandable and sometimes justified, it is the obligation of every court, but particularly the final court, to look with new eyes at the ways in which it performs its functions. The problems of cost and delay in getting to courts affect every court in the Australian Judicature and extend to the High Court of Australia. If new methodologies could be adopted which tackled these problems and brought more people to justice within the human capacity of the courts (including that of the seven members of the apex court) the totality of justice in our society could be increased. We should not put such possibilities out of mind. Short of such 'radical' solutions, there may be other ways by which more cases could be disposed of by the High Court of Australia than the current number which approximates 60 civil and criminal appeals in any given year.<sup>62</sup> One possible way of increasing the number of such appeals would be the adoption of the disposal of the appeal with short form reasons as is now possible, by statute, in the case of the Court of Appeal of New South Wales.<sup>63</sup> Innovation in techniques and procedures should be the constant companion of the contemporary Australian judge. They should be motivated by the objective of reducing the twin enemies of true justice for all - cost and delay.

Interveners and Amici Curiae

One area in which, I believe, innovation is required concerns the acceptance of assistance from interveners and amicus curiae. I expressed my opinion on this issue in Levy v Victoria.<sup>64</sup> There, an industrial organisation was denied leave to intervene but permitted to make a submission as amicus curiae. In Attorney-General v Breckler<sup>65</sup> a difference arose as to whether a national organisation with responsibility for administering superannuation funds should be heard in a test case

---

<sup>62</sup> High Court of Australia, Annual Report 1998-99, 65-66. In the year under review 41 civil appeals were decided (compared with 48 in the year 1997-98) and 17 criminal appeals (the same as in 1997-98).

<sup>63</sup> Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW) s 45(4).

<sup>64</sup> (1997) 189 CLR 571, 650-653.

<sup>65</sup> (1999) 197 CLR 83, 134-137. Cf G Williams, 'The Amicus Curiae and Intervener in the High Court of Australia: A Corporate Analysis' (2000) 28 Federal Law Review 365.

concerning the meaning of complex superannuation legislation. The right to intervene was denied. So it was in the case of a compensation authority in tax litigation, although it was demonstrated that the outcome of the proceedings before the High Court could affect the interests of that authority in concurrent proceedings before a Victorian court.<sup>66</sup> The authority was allowed to leave its written submissions but was not heard orally to support them.

Once it became clear that courts, particularly the High Court of Australia, are not engaged in a mechanical function of applying unquestioned law to unambiguous facts, the choices which judges must make necessitates, at least sometimes, receiving assistance from persons other than the parties. The practice of other final courts, particularly the Supreme Court of the United States and Supreme Court of Canada, has adapted to this new reality. It seems inevitable that the High Court of Australia will, in due course, do the same.

International law

Many of the cases which come before the High Court already directly involve issues of international law. These can include questions of the meaning of international treaties incorporated in Australian domestic law,<sup>67</sup> elucidation of the law of extradition<sup>68</sup> and of the Closer Economic Relations Treaty with New Zealand.<sup>69</sup> The indirect impact of international law may be seen in a series of cases where the judges have had regard to international human rights law in elucidating a principle of the common law in Australia.<sup>70</sup> It seems likely, for the reasons which Justice Brennan explained in Mabo v Queensland [No 2],<sup>71</sup> that international human rights law, expressed in treaties to which Australia is a party, will come to play an increasing part in the development of Australia's common law.

In England, this process will probably increase substantially following the coming into force of the Human Rights Act 1998 (UK).<sup>72</sup> Already, the fact that the United Kingdom is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights for the compliance of its laws with the European Convention on Human Rights, has had an impact on substantive law. It reaches into unexpected fields. One of these was recently called to notice by Chief Justice Spigelman of the Supreme Court of New

<sup>66</sup> Commissioner of Taxation v Scully (2000) 169 ALR 459. Application refused on 7 September 1999.

<sup>67</sup> Applicant A v Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs (1997) 190 CLR 225 (concerning the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) as applied by the Migration Act 1958 (Cth) s 4(1)).

<sup>68</sup> AB v The Queen (1999) 198 CLR 111, 128-129, 141-145.

<sup>69</sup> Project Blue Sky Inc v Australian Broadcasting Authority (1998) 194 CLR 355.

<sup>70</sup> Minister for Immigration and Ethnic Affairs v Teoh (1995) 183 CLR 273; Dietrich v The Queen (1992) 177 CLR 292.

<sup>71</sup> (1992) 175 CLR 1, 42.

<sup>72</sup> M Hunt, 'The "Horizontal Effect" of the Human Rights Act' [1998] Public Law 423; A Hooper, 'The Impact of the Human Rights Act on Judicial Decision-Making' [1998] EHRLR 672, 684; A Lester and D Pannick (eds) Human Rights Law and Practice (1999) 31-33; W M C Gummow, Change and Continuity (1999) 107.

South Wales.<sup>73</sup> He drew attention to the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Osman v The United Kingdom.<sup>74</sup> In that case, the European Court was highly critical of a decision of the House of Lords<sup>75</sup> in which their Lordships had applied their earlier decision in Hill v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire.<sup>76</sup> In the Hill case, it had been held that no action would lie against police for negligence in the investigation and suppression of crime. Courts, it was held, should not supervise the difficult work of police. The European Court concluded that such an approach involved the conferral of a blanket immunity on police which constituted an unjustifiable restriction on a victim's rights to have determination by a court of law of the merits of his or her claim against the police. It was decided that this constituted a violation of the obligation of the United Kingdom to afford access to the courts in such cases.

This decision has not passed without criticism in England.<sup>77</sup> However, it seems inevitable that rulings of this kind will come to play an important part in the future development of Australian, as well as English, law. Although Australian court decisions are not subject to review in a human rights court, they may be subjected to scrutiny in the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations.<sup>78</sup> It was a decision of that Committee concerning a law in Australia which eventually occasioned the enactment of a federal statute,<sup>79</sup> proceedings in the High Court<sup>80</sup> and, ultimately, the repeal of Tasmania's laws criminalising consenting private adult homosexual acts.<sup>81</sup> In the field of business law the impact of international markets, and the international treaties and principles to which they have given rise,<sup>82</sup> seem likely to expand with a consequential growth of regional and international regulation. Australia's legal system will not be immune from these developments. In small and large cases, it is important for judges, dealing with issues of legal principle, to keep themselves alert to analogous developments of the law that are occurring elsewhere and to the economic implications of a decision in one case for the efficient operation of the legal system and the economy more generally.

Artificial intelligence

All of the foregoing constitute rather modest ideas about the years ahead. But the chief lesson of recent decades has been the explosion of scientific knowledge and of

---

<sup>73</sup> J J Spigelman, 'Access to Justice and Human Rights Treaties' (2000) 22 Sydney Law Review 141.

<sup>74</sup> (1998) 7 Reports of Judgments and Decisions.

<sup>75</sup> Osman v Ferguson [1993] 3 All ER 344.

<sup>76</sup> [1989] AC 53. Cf Perre v Apand Pty Ltd (1999) 198 CLR 180, 278-279.

<sup>77</sup> Lord Hoffman 'Human Rights and the House of Lords' (1999) 62 Modern L Rev 159, 164.

<sup>78</sup> Established by the First Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to which Australia is a party.

<sup>79</sup> Human Rights (Sexual Conduct) Act 1994 (Cth).

<sup>80</sup> Croome v Tasmania (1997) 191 CLR 119.

<sup>81</sup> Criminal Code (Tas), ss 122(a), (c), 123.

<sup>82</sup> See e.g. P Read, 'Uniform Law for International Loans: A New Solution?' in W Weerasooria (ed) Perspectives on Banking, Finance and Credit Law (1999) 241.

its technological applications. Within fifty years the great technological developments of the century have been expanded beyond the wildest imaginings even of clever people of the mid-century. They include nuclear fission, informatics and biogenetics. The law has sometimes to sort out the consequences of these developments, as when issues arise concerning the patentability of inventions said to involve living genetic material.<sup>83</sup> Often technological inventions come to the aid of the law. Information technology has radically changed the organisation of the lawyer's office and the judges' and advocates' chambers.<sup>84</sup> I do not doubt that Griffith, Barton and O'Connor would regard as miracles the way in which word processors, interlinked between cities, can perform the functions of reducing ideas to text in ways that were inconceivable in 1903. In such an environment, as we look into the future, it is necessary to challenge contemporary imagination. Can it seriously be expected that the law and its institutions in the coming century will successfully resist fundamental change in their ways of doing things as they have in the past? Or will the law office and courtroom in a hundred years time be as unrecognisable to us as the hospital wards of today would be to medical practitioners of a century ago?

Rapid changes are already happening with voice recognition that will enable judges and lawyers in the future to summon, by oral commands, the accurate analysis of relevant case decisions and citation of legislation. But will the advances be even more fundamental? Will it be possible to reduce legal analysis to computer programs so that artificial intelligence will take over at least some of the functions currently performed by judges and lawyers?<sup>85</sup> Before we scoff at such ideas, we should pause to think of the dramatic alteration of the external world in which the law operates today. In the space of a century amazing changes have occurred. In but two decades computers, the Internet and Cyberspace have taken hold. There is at present no possibility of programming machines which will have the will to do justice and to respond in a human way to human problems. But many routine decisions may be susceptible to automated analysis. In several jurisdictions, migration and taxation legislation is being written in a way apt for the early forms of artificial intelligence.<sup>86</sup>

The main lesson of the past quarter century is that change occurs more quickly than humans expect. The capacity to cope with change is constantly being tested. As a profession, law is generally resistant to radical change. Indeed conservation, predicability and stability are part of law's essential mission. The challenge of the

---

<sup>83</sup> Diamond v Chakravarty 447 US 303 (1980) (biogenetically engineered organisms); Diamond v Diehr 450 US 175 (1981) (inventions in the field of information technology).

<sup>84</sup> M D Kirby, 'The Future of Courts - Do they Have One?' (1999) 8 Journal Judl Admin 185, 188-190.

<sup>85</sup> P Gray, Artificial Legal Intelligence (1997).

<sup>86</sup> Ibid 27, 52. See also L T McCarthy, 'Reflections on TAXMAN: An Experiment in Artificial Intelligence and Legal Reasoning' (1977) 90 Harvard Law Rev 837; R Susskind, 'Expert Systems in Law: A Jurisprudential Approach to Artificial Intelligence and Legal Reasoning' (1986) 49 Modern L Rev 168, 170; R Susskind, The Future of Law (1998).

years ahead will be to maintain the rule of law in a time of unprecedented social and technological movement.

A GOLDEN FUTURE

I cease this reverie. Griffith, Barton and O'Connor are safely on the walls of the great courtroom, looking down on me. The daily work of the High Court continues in ways that would not have seemed so very different to them. Most of what was good has been preserved. The High Court of Australia is one of the enduring and continuously serving constitutional courts of the world. Constitutionalism and the rule of law have been safeguarded by the people of Australia and by the Justices of the High Court and the other judges, magistrates and public office-holders of the country.

The future beckons. It is the duty of those who temporarily hold judicial and legal authority to safeguard the precious legacy from the century that is closing; to be vigilant and alert to the injustices and inefficiencies of the legal system which remain to be corrected; and to be aware that science and technology will call the law to account in the coming century. We should cease our reveries about the golden past, which was not always so golden for all. We should ready ourselves to respond to the challenges of the future to provide equal justice under law for all people in our Commonwealth and also beyond.