MACQUARIE
University
SYDNEY · AUSTRALIA

From the analysis of Egyptian mummies, Roman pottery and ancient spells to investigations into the Gallipoli campaign and Australia's war brides, Macquarie's dynamic history and archaeology researchers are bringing an exciting new perspective to our understanding of the complex issues that shaped humanity's past.

The scope of research in history and archaeology at Macquarie is unique in Australia. Our research spans periods from Eurasian and Australian prehistory to the present, using diverse archival and archaeological materials, and varying approaches from Big History to microstudies, including innovative reflection upon the nature of historical enquiry.

Our high-profile researchers – who include six Fellows of the Australian Academy of the Humanities, two Fellows of the Academy of Social Sciences in Australia and an ARC Future Fellow – have established valuable international collaborations with institutions such as the Universities of Cambridge, Chicago, Göttingen, Leipzig, London, Oxford and Tsinghua; British Museum; Louvre Museum; National Museum of Iran; Ministry of State for Antiquities, Egypt; Institute of Historical Research, London; Institut français d'archéologie orientale, Cairo; The New School, New York; and Quanzhou Maritime Museum, China.

Macquarie is home to the Big History Institute, which provides a hub for scholars interested in interdisciplinary research on the interconnected history of the cosmos, earth, life and humanity. Our Museum of Ancient Cultures houses Australia's largest papyrological collection, while the Australian Centre for Ancient Numismatic Studies is an internationally recognised leader in the study of ancient numismatics.

Our researchers also enjoy an international reputation as leaders in their fields. In the most recent Excellence in Research for Australia evaluation, our history and archaeology research received a rating of performance above world standard.

As a higher degree research candidate at Macquarie University, you'll have the opportunity to conduct research alongside some of the world's best scholars and have access to outstanding facilities.
